Stephen R. Covey on Living a Principle-Centered Life

Stephen R. Covey, author of The 7 Habits of Highly Effective People and many other great personal growth books, passed away this Monday, July 16th at the age of 79. Covey was an outstanding motivational speaker and his words live on in this address he gave at Montana State University in 2008 on living a principally-centered life.

He explains how those who live without principles tend to evaluate themselves according to what others think. He also encourages the incoming students he is addressing to not cram their learning in order to just get by, as that is a bad habit that Covey confesses robbed him of much of the value of his early education. He encourages us to live our lives by a compass and not by a clock, and to become the creative force behind our own life through following "true north" principles until they become habits.
